

01. MEDITATION 1 : THEORY,PRACTICE,REFLECTION

DURATION : 12:31

STUDY SHEET

COURSE SUMMARY

In this video, you will learn to explore meditation by focusing on the awareness of the inhale and exhale, thus developing a state of mindfulness. This technique promotes the union between mind and body, allowing for liberation from past pains and illnesses. You will discover the importance of breathing in the healing process and how it can activate your parasympathetic system by stimulating the vagus nerve. The video also addresses levels of consciousness and deep insight, helping you observe your emotions without reacting instinctively. Finally, you will be guided to practise meditation to cultivate a present moment and promote true freedom of movement, essential for osteopaths.

MEDITATION: THEORY, PRACTICE, AND REFLECTION

The meditation we are going to explore is based on awareness of the inhale and exhale. This practice leads us to mindfulness, a state where we can discern rather than judge.

AWARENESS OF BREATH

Being aware of our breath allows us to unite our mind and body. In this state of presence, we can free ourselves from the shackles of the past. Many of our illnesses and sufferings stem from this past, of which we are often prisoners.

I invite you to be fully aware here and now. By becoming aware of your breath, you increase your concentration energy and begin to feel your body. This involves releasing the body, especially during exhalation. By stimulating the vagus nerve, you activate your parasympathetic system, thereby promoting recovery and healing.

LEVELS OF CONSCIOUSNESS

There are several levels of consciousness, and we will explore a few of them. Mindfulness can be divided into an object and a subject. This means you can be aware of something, either objectively or subjectively.

With practice, you will develop what is called insight. This will allow you to free yourself from your sensations, to observe your emotions without reacting immediately. For example, when you feel anger, learn to observe this sensation rather than letting yourself be carried away by it.

MEDITATION PRACTICE

To begin, focus on your inhale and exhale. Follow each movement of your breath. This will help you relax and let go.

When you are aware of your breath, you offer yourself a gift: the present moment. This moment of presence allows you to free yourself from thoughts of the past and worries about the future.

THE IMPORTANCE OF INHALATION AND EXHALATION

As an osteopath, it is crucial to understand the importance of inhalation and exhalation. These movements in the body are essential for maintaining freedom of movement. Minor movements govern major movements, and it is important to focus on the subtlety of breathing to reach what is called the still point.

HEALING PROCESS

Healing begins with the recognition of concerns and symptoms. It is essential to bring patients to a point of balance, a healing process that restores confidence in life. Sometimes, simply talking can bring about awareness and allow people to leave with renewed joy.

In conclusion, meditation and breath awareness are powerful tools for promoting healing and well-being. By cultivating this practice, you can transform your relationship with yourself and your body.
